JUPITER AND THE HORSE. - "Father of man and besst," raid the horse approaching the turone of Japiter, "it is said that I am one of the abblest of the creations with which you have adorned the world, and my vanity bids me believe it; but do you not think my form still capable of improvement." "And what dost then suppose would improve thee? speak, I am open to instruction," said the grecious drity, smiling. "Perhaps," continued the horse, "I should have more speed it my legs were longer and more slander; a long swan-like nee'r woold add to my beauty; a broader chest would increase my strength; and, occa for all, since you have destined me to carry your favorhe man, it might be as well if the sadde, which the benevalent herseman supplies me with, were a part of my being." "Good." pursued Jeriter, "have patience a moment!" and, with a solema air, the god spake the word of creation. The dust become animated, or ganized matter was combined, and suddenly stood before the throne the frightful camel, The berse saw, shuddered, and tremble I from excessive disgust. "Here are longer and more stender legs." said Jove; "here is a long swanlike neck; broader chest; a ready created saddle. Post then desire to be endowed with a similar form?" The horse still trembled. "Go," continued the deity, 'and this time the admoishmest. To remind thee occasionally, howe ver, of thy audecity, this new creation shall continue to exist." Then, easting a sustaining plance upon the camel, Jove continued, "And the horse shall never perceive thee without lear and tremtling.
